Re: Pregnant Workers Fairness Act

Dear Member of Congress:

As organizations dedicated to combating sex discrimination and promoting the health and economic security of our nation's families, we write to urge you to support the Pregnant Workers Fairness Act, a bill that would promote nondiscrimination by ensuring that pregnant workers are not forced out of their jobs unnecessarily or denied reasonable job modifications that would allow them to continue working and supporting their families. This bill promotes the health and economic security of pregnant women, their babies, and their families without harming the economy.

Three-quarters of women entering the workforce will be pregnant and employed at some point. Since the Pregnancy Discrimination Act (PDA) became law in 1978, there has been a dramatic demographic shift in the workforce. Not only do women now make up almost half of the workforce, but there are more pregnant workers than ever before and they are working later into their pregnancies. At some point in their pregnancies, some of these women—especially those in physically strenuous jobs—will face a conflict between their duties at work and the demands of pregnancy.

Under current pregnancy law, the PDA, employers cannot discriminate based on pregnancy, childbirth, or related medical conditions. This means that employers cannot fire, refuse to hire, or otherwise treat an employee adversely because of pregnancy and must treat pregnant workers at least as well as those similar in their ability or inability to work. Despite these existing protections, pregnant workers are all too often forced out of their jobs unnecessarily and denied the minor modifications to job duties, job rules or job policies that would enable them to continue working. Women in low-wage jobs, a group that is disproportionately made up of women of color and immigrant workers, are particularly likely to be affected by this form of pregnancy discrimination. For example, a retail worker in Salina, Kansas, was fired because she needed to carry a water bottle to stay hydrated and prevent bladder infections.ⁱ An activity director at a nursing home in Valparaiso, Indiana, was terminated because she required help with some physically strenuous aspects of her job to prevent having another miscarriage.ⁱⁱ In Landover, Maryland, a delivery truck driver was forced out on unpaid leave because she had a lifting restriction and was denied light duty.ⁱⁱⁱ These women lost in court, even though workers covered by the Americans with Disabilities Act Amendments Act would be entitled to carry water or receive help on the job. Despite the protections of the PDA, pregnant women are still often treated worse than other workers who may be limited in their ability to perform certain aspects of a job.

The Pregnant Workers Fairness Act, modeled after the Americans with Disabilities Act, addresses this problem through an existing and familiar reasonable accommodations framework. Specifically, this legislation prevents employers from forcing pregnant women out of the workplace (either by placing them on leave or firing them altogether) and ensures that, where a minor job modification would allow a woman to continue working, an employer must provide it unless doing so would pose an undue hardship. California enacted similar legislation in 2000, where it has been used countless times to help pregnant women stay healthy and keep their jobs. Connecticut, Hawaii, Louisiana, Alaska, Texas, and Illinois also explicitly require certain employers to provide reasonable accommodation to pregnant employees. While plenty of women are able to work through their pregnancies without any job modifications, those who cannot desperately need a clear right to do so. This bill would empower women while benefitting employers by providing certainty about their responsibilities.

Minor job modifications for pregnant women are a public health necessity. A choice between working under unhealthy conditions and potentially losing income is no choice at all. Women who cannot perform some aspects of their usual duties without risking their own health or the health of their pregnancy, but are in need of income, may have to continue working under dangerous conditions. There are health consequences to pushing women out of the workforce as well. Stress from job loss can increase the risk of having a premature baby and/or a baby with low birth weight. In addition, women who can continue to work during pregnancy may be able to take a longer period of leave following childbirth, which in turn facilitates breastfeeding, bonding with and caring for a new child, and recovering from childbirth. Breastfeeding has extensive health benefits for mothers and infants, which may reduce future illness related absences.

Pregnancy-related adjustments at work also promote family economic security. In this difficult economy, workers cannot afford to be pushed out or terminated from their jobs because of pregnancy and childbirth. By continuing to work, pregnant women can maintain income and seniority at work, while forced leave sets new mothers back with lost wages and missed advancement opportunities. When pregnant women are fired, not only do they and their families lose critical income, but they must fight extra hard to re-enter a job market that is especially brutal on the unemployed and on pregnant women. Similarly, new mothers often confront mounting hiring bias. On the other hand, providing reasonable accommodations carries benefits for employers, including reduced turnover and increased productivity.

Ensuring equal opportunity for working women is vital to the health and economic security of our nation's families. We urge you to co-sponsor the Pregnant Workers Fairness Act and would welcome the opportunity to provide you with detailed information on these recommendations and to speak with you further about the critical needs of pregnant women and new mothers.
